Undoubtedly the idea of an analyst being proficient in Arabic cannot by past standards be said to be absolutely related to area intelligence production. However, the analyst believes that such proficiency is no longer a luxury, but a necessity. Although exploitation of written sources has reached a peak, actual first hand accounts of specific areas in the Arab or Islamic World are relatively absent.

The preferences outlined, both as to activity and training, are designed to remedy this situation. Accordingly both field work and language training to make maximum use of field experience are desired. In reality, these are conservative recommendations. The Department of State has already instituted a program of this type for its Middle East area specialists. Several CIA Chiefs of Station have indicated the necessity for analysts mastering geographic field work techniques combined with the language.

The decision as to what type of activity and training a senior analyst should receive can be debated indefinitely. Unfortunately, the Middle East and Islamic areas of Africa are areas where the gaps in our area knowledge are widening in the face of a Soviet effort that has enlisted the finest Russian geographers and ethnographers. The question is: Can our intelligence effort continue to produce the language dabbler and half trained area specialist? Regardless of the decision in this particular case the analyst intends to be a respected area specialist.
